At last, autumn

Text and photos by Meghan Lyden
news@columbiamissourian.com

Rain fell overnight in Columbia, bringing leaves to rest on the hood of a van.

A car parked at MU reflects the autumn leaves.

Rain soaked the trees in this Columbia yard before the sunlight hit them, causing steam to rise from their trunks.

A leafy vine, in the midst of changing color, snakes up the slats of a fence in Columbia.

Fall came later than normal in Columbia. Leaves were changing, pumpkins were harvested, and autumn light enveloped the town. Fall was not only in the country and on the paths through the woods; downtown Columbia and its surrounding neighborhoods were the stage for the colorful leaves and the streaming light.

Fall came later than normal in Columbia. Leaves were changing, pumpkins were harvested, and autumn light enveloped the town. Fall was not only in the country and on the paths through the woods; downtown Columbia and its surrounding neighborhoods were the stage for the colorful leaves and the streaming light.